AI Assessment

There is a mismatch between the image model prediction and the user-reported details. The image model predicted Acne, which typically appears on the face, chest, or back as pimples or clogged pores. However, the reported symptoms describe dryness and irritation on the hands related to frequent handwashing and soap exposure, pointing toward Irritant Contact Dermatitis or Hand Eczema.

Recommended Care

Protect the skin barrier by using mild, fragrance-free cleansers instead of harsh soaps. Apply a thick moisturizing cream or petroleum jelly immediately after washing hands, and wear protective gloves when handling water, detergents, or household chemicals.

Combined Medicine Information

Do not apply acne medications or medicated creams to dry, irritated skin on the hands, as these can aggravate irritation. Use non-medicated, soothing emollients and consult a healthcare professional before using any medicated ointments.

Combined Doctor Advice

Because the image analysis conflicts with the reported location and symptoms, please consult a qualified dermatologist for an in-person assessment and accurate medical diagnosis.

Disease Information

The image prediction and reported symptoms do not sufficiently match. The result is inconclusive and should not be treated as a confirmed diagnosis.

Medicine / Treatment Information

Do not apply acne medications or medicated creams to dry, irritated skin on the hands, as these can aggravate irritation. Use non-medicated, soothing emollients and consult a healthcare professional before using any medicated ointments.

General Care / Home Remedy

Protect the skin barrier by using mild, fragrance-free cleansers instead of harsh soaps. Apply a thick moisturizing cream or petroleum jelly immediately after washing hands, and wear protective gloves when handling water, detergents, or household chemicals.

Doctor Advice

Because the image analysis conflicts with the reported location and symptoms, please consult a qualified dermatologist for an in-person assessment and accurate medical diagnosis.
